With an incoherent cry of delight Kirk folded his wife in his arms, and she kissed him before them all.

"Come, we must get back. The music has stopped again," Kirk turned to the judge. "Nothing is to be said until Miss Gar—Mrs. Anthony gives the word, you understand? I can't thank you all half enough. Now, Alan, see if the coast is clear, quickly." He was still in a panic, for there yet remained a chance of discovery and ruin. One more instant of suspense, then the two stepped out. The door closed softly behind them, and they strolled around the corner of the north wing and into the crowd. It had all happened so quickly that even yet they were dazed and disbelieving.

"My wife!" Kirk whispered, while a tremendous rush of emotion swept over him. She trembled in answer like a wind-shaken leaf. "You're mine, Chiquita! They can't take you away." His voice broke.

"I am still dreaming. What have I done? Oh—h—they will know! In my face they will read the truth. But I do not care. Senor, I do not know if some time you will be sorry for this action, but I shall never cease loving you. I prayed hourly to the Blessed Virgin, and she heard. Now, I shall perish until you come."

"When you give me leave—through steel and stone, through fire and water."

"Quick! For the one time call me that—She hesitated, blushing vividly. "I will leave it in my dreams."

"My wife!" he whispered tenderly. "He! Chiquita mia!" her father cried as they came to him. "There you are then. I have missed you." His eyes smoldered as he gazed suspiciously at Kirk.

"Ah, but I was too warm," she said easily. "Yonder by the door we have been standing in the night breeze. And where is Senor?"

"He is looking for you."

"One would think him a jealous husband already," she exclaimed lightly. Then extending her hand coolly to Kirk, "I thank you, senor, for the dance."

Her husband bowed. "I shall not soon forget it." To the father he added in a low voice: "I thank you also for your courtesy. We have been discussing your daughter's marriage during the dance, and it is my one greatest hope that she will never regret it."

The banker acknowledged the words ceremoniously. "Love is a thing that comes and goes. Marriage alone can bind it. Some day you will thank me, and then perhaps you will honor our house again, eh?"

"I shall be happy to come whenever you wish." As he walked away the banker said, with relief:

things we have tried to do, and not be called in question for self-admission (big-headed ideas are not thought of there), and I said the preacher, "can scarcely wait" sometimes until I can get home when all seems to have been a failure, or a success to ask my precious ones. "How did I reach today?" and they tell me, and they do not fear that I will anger, or have the swell-head at the truth. I tell you the preachers' heart starves sometimes."

Mr. McElidowney dwelt at length on the word homesickness, and said he believed the Son of God was homesick, and that he was so far from his home, giving some arguments as to the distance He was from home, and that Jesus was 33 years from his home, and how we became homesick when but a few hundred miles from home, and of his going with a young preacher friend to the home of the childhood of this young preacher, the meeting of the boy preacher, and his mother, and of how homesick he was as his mind crossed the intervening space, and he seemingly stood by the grave where slept his own precious mother.

"Gates of pearl, capstones of amethyst, thrones of gold," said the preacher, "do not stir our souls as this word in my text, 'Home'."

"Thrones may rot, empires wither, sorrows howl, worlds may die, in an earthquake, and the world be hurled amid the precessions of planets, and dirge of spheres, everlasting ages may roll in their irresistible sweep. You nor I will ever forget the one wonderful, beautiful word home."

"Heaven is simply a home. Some day you will see it, and you will sleep in death, and if we have been faithful, we will hear the choir of angels, and we will wonder where we are, when up along the flowery path of the heavenly home will come our loving lost, and we will hear the words 'welcome, welcome home.'"

The sermon closed with two illustrations, one of a little homeless orphan girl who was saved in one of the meetings. This little girl was the little mother in a home where she had no mother, and her people said she should not unite with the church, and the preacher said he loved the little homeless child but that he closed the door of the church in her face. The other was of his going since a preacher to visit his mother brother, and his wife, and how they failed to meet him at the door, but the preacher said he went to the brother's home, and was welcomed and the estrangements of the past were cancelled.

Many were visibly affected when the sermon closed. A number asked for prayer, some were saved, and the pastor took the names of a great many for church membership Sunday morning.

The subject tonight will be "Life."

ANTI-TRUST

Arlington cemetery, and a government road to Gettysburg. At that time there was considerable feeling displayed in the controversy.

It is notable that the site finally selected by the Commission of Fine Arts, the memorial commission and Congress itself, is the one first recommended by the park commission under the act of 1902. Many of the objections made at that time to the site have passed with the years. The city had not developed so far in that direction at that time, the site was not so easily accessible and the ground was much lower and more swampy.

The members of the Lincoln Memorial Commission are: William H. Taft, chairman; Joseph C. S. Blackburn, recently appointed to fill a vacancy left by the death of Snoddy St. Cullom; Joseph G. Cannon; George Peabody Wetmore; Samuel Walker McCall; Champ Clark, and Thomas S. Martin.
